In the late 1960s and early 1970s, I was a young music journalist with a unique opportunity to spend time with some of the most iconic musicians of all time. I was there when the Beatles were recording their last album, "Abbey Road," and I witnessed the Stones' infamous Altamont concert. I interviewed Bob Dylan at length, and I even spent a night jamming with Eric Clapton.

In this book, I share my stories about these legendary musicians. I tell the stories behind some of their most famous songs, and I reveal the personal side of these complex and often enigmatic figures.

My Hard Days and Long Nights with the Beatles, the Stones, Bob Dylan, and Eric Clapton is a must-read for any fan of rock and roll music. It's a unique and intimate look at the lives and work of some of the most talented and influential musicians of all time.

The Beatles

I first met the Beatles in 1966, when they were at the height of their fame. I was working as a reporter for a small music magazine, and I was assigned to interview them for a cover story.

I was immediately struck by their charisma and their sense of humor. They were also incredibly talented musicians, and I was amazed by their ability to write such catchy and memorable songs.

I spent several hours with the Beatles that day, and I was able to get to know them a little bit. I learned that they were just as normal as anyone else, and that they had the same dreams and aspirations as any other young people.

I also learned that they were very serious about their music. They were always looking for ways to improve their sound, and they were always experimenting with new ideas.

I was lucky enough to see the Beatles perform live several times, and I was always impressed by their energy and their connection with the audience. They were truly one of the greatest live bands of all time.

The Rolling Stones

I first met the Rolling Stones in 1967, when they were on tour in the United States. I was working as a music critic for a major newspaper, and I was assigned to review their concert.

I was immediately struck by the Stones' raw energy and their rebellious attitude. They were not afraid to push the boundaries of rock and roll, and they were always looking for new ways to shock and surprise their audience.

I spent several hours with the Stones that day, and I was able to get to know them a little bit. I learned that they were just as complex and enigmatic as their music. They were charming and funny, but they were also capable of great cruelty.

I also learned that the Stones were very serious about their music. They were always looking for ways to improve their sound, and they were always experimenting with new ideas.

I was lucky enough to see the Stones perform live several times, and I was always impressed by their energy and their connection with the audience. They were truly one of the greatest live bands of all time.

Bob Dylan

I first met Bob Dylan in 1965, when he was on tour in the United States. I was working as a music critic for a major newspaper, and I was assigned to interview him for a cover story.

I was immediately struck by Dylan's intelligence and his charisma. He was a true poet, and his songs were filled with deep meaning and emotion.

I spent several hours with Dylan that day, and I was able to get to know him a little bit. I learned that he was a very private person, but he was also very passionate about his music.

I also learned that Dylan was very serious about his music. He was always looking for ways to improve his sound, and he was always experimenting with new ideas.

I was lucky enough to see Dylan perform live several times, and I was always impressed by his energy and his connection with the audience. He was truly one of the greatest live performers of all time.

Eric Clapton

I first met Eric Clapton in 1969, when he was on tour with Cream. I was working as a music critic for a major newspaper, and I was assigned to interview him for a cover story.

I was immediately struck by Clapton's quiet confidence and his humble demeanor. He was a true guitar virtuoso, and his playing was both technically brilliant and emotionally expressive.

I spent several hours with Clapton that day, and I was able to get to know him a little bit. I learned that he was a very private person, but he was also very passionate about his music.

I also learned that Clapton was very serious about his music. He was always looking for ways to improve his sound, and he was always experimenting with new ideas.

I was lucky enough to see Clapton perform live several times, and I was always impressed by his energy and his connection with the audience. He was truly one of the greatest live performers of
